THIRD SEASON

ANGELA STRETCH

Third Season is first a poem. Using the telecommunication method of Morse code, the artist transforms information into a visual syntax, a media poem.

What the receiver views is controlled by the artist's particular devices and their personal choices. The textual drift suggests a view of the poem that is malleable.

Third Season is the first public iteration in a media poetry series the artist is working on.

T h i r d S e a s o n

I cannot read my heart
it is a reticence
on the brink of invading

Time shivers, the autumn leaves under a bronze sky
poles brushed by wings of wire

Tangled musics sweeter and more fierce than hands can manage

A R T I S T S T A T E M E N T

Poetry can offer us an imaginative third place, where unanswerable questions can be asked and dreams can be realised. The third season of autumn connects us with the past, present-and-future enabling us to imagine what might be, regardless of the powers that move us forward.

Third Season, the media poem is a node in a relationship of dots and dashes representing letters of the alphabet and punctuation through the arrangement of these two-systems of Morse Code.

An interest for me, as maker and receiver of these works is to evoke a sense of the practice of translation, understood as encompassing acts of transduction, transposition, transliteration, transcription and transformation.
